WHOOPING COUGH

Whooping cough again has begun to assume serious proportions in the state, the State Board of Health declares in a bulletin just issued, and there are certain things that parents should know about the disease. Though ordinarily regarded as relatively harmless, it causes deaths in Kentucky every year.

It is more fatal to children under three years of age than to others. After five years of age the fatality rate decreases rapidly and for that reason young children should be kept away from the disease as long as possible.

If the child has been exposed to a cough that persists after the fifth or sixth day, whooping cough should be suspected and the child who has been exposed kept away from other children.

Whooping cough vaccine, the bulletin states, now is being made in the board's laboratories for free distribution and may be had on application. This vaccine has been used successfully both as a preventive and curative measure.

"Of 574 children who had been exposed to whooping cough," the bulletin continues, "only 22 who had received the vaccine developed the disease. Of 700 children who had been exposed to the disease without being given the vaccine, 534 developed whooping cough. Most observers who have used the vaccine as a curative measure agree that it moderates the severity of the disease and shortens its duration, having a special influence upon the severity of the coughing paroxysms."
